HOUSTON CHRONICLE

Concerned that two strips of filler dangling from Discovery's underside could cause overheating during re-entry, NASA managers said Sunday they might ask the ship's crew to remove or trim the material.

The task could be carried out during a third spacewalk by astronauts Steve Robinson and Soichi Noguchi planned for Wednesday or become the focus of an unscheduled fourth walk.

Mission managers planned to finish their assessment of the risk posed by the protrusions near Discovery's nose today.

The dangling pieces of fabric were spotted in photoproached to dock.

One piece of fiber sticks out from the shuttle's belly by about 1.1 inch. The other protrudes by about nine-tenths of an inch.

Spacewalkers would be asked to take action if engineers determine that the excess fiber would disturb the high-temperature airflow enough to dangerously heat up Discovery's belly during its Aug. 8 re-entry and landing, said NASA's

Wayne Hale, the mission management team chairman.

The pieces of hanging fabric are part of 6-inch, fire-retardant strips, or "gap fillers," that are glued between each of the black silica tiles to protect the shuttle's underside from frictional heating as the spacecraft glides back into Earth's atmosphere.

The protrusions are unrelated to the foam seen flying off
